For 40 years in Washtenaw County …
Each One – Teach One

The political climate of the late 1960s and early 1970s helped a rising national interest in literacy as social justice to take root in Washtenaw County. Before that time, problems with literacy were associated with third world countries. However, in the early 70s, awareness of widespread illiteracy among adults in the United States propelled a new focus on literacy domestically (Guizzetti, 2002). In 1971, congregants led by Pastor Dean Tyson from Ypsilanti’s St. Phillips Church (closed in 2002), began to reach out to adults who could not read. Interested community members Richard Townsend and Betsy Lawrence added expertise to the new Literacy Council of Washtenaw County. For the first few years, a handful of volunteers, a file cabinet and a mailbox were all that supported matches between two unknown adults over the phone – only the tutor and learner met face-to-face.

In the mid-70s the national Right to Read effort focused local attention on the passionate efforts of St. Phillip’s congregants, and interest grew in the community. By 1976, the Friends of the Ann Arbor District Library stepped up as the first supporter outside of the church and an annual budget of $2,000 allowed for expansion into the Laubach literacy methods. The tradition of training and support for tutors began.

1971-1975
Parishoners at St. Phillips Church in Ypsilanti launch and operate the “Literacy Council of Washtenaw County” by matching learners with adults willing to be tutors.

1976
Friends of the Ann Arbor District Library are the first contributors outside of the church, and the Laubach Literacy method of training tutors was implemented.
The so-called Laubach method was beginning to spread in America, even though it was well-established in developing countries. As a missionary, Frank C. Laubach developed a simple method to teach the Maranao people of the Philippines to learn to read and write. He also discovered the potential of volunteer tutors, as newly-literate Maranaos offered to teach illiterate family and friends. This one-to-one instructional approach became known as “Each One – Teach One.” Dr. Laubach’s adult literacy method demonstrated throughout the developing world that individuals could progress socially and economically through improved literacy and community members could learn to help each other.

During the mid-80s, the State began supporting the start of literacy councils in other Michigan communities, but Washtenaw Literacy, Michigan’s oldest literacy council, was taking off! The Ypsilanti District Library secured grant funding to support the first paid staff member in 1986, and provided office space in the basement of the main library. In 2002, Washtenaw Literacy moved to the new branch library on Whittaker Road.

Today, if measured by the number of learners served, Washtenaw Literacy is the largest literacy council in Michigan, as well as the oldest.
For forty years, Washtenaw Literacy has led a bold challenge against illiteracy. In 1971, a small group of parishioners from St. Philips Lutheran Church in Ypsilanti led by Pastor Dean Tyson responded to the new and alarming awareness that illiteracy among adults was not just a Third World problem, it was rampant even in America – and in our own Washtenaw County. State and Federal initiatives to improve literacy followed, and soon corporate America joined the movement.

By the mid-80s, many communities were establishing literacy councils with burgeoning public and private support, but the “Literacy Council of Washtenaw County” had already been providing services for fifteen years.

Since 1971, over 15,000 learners have been served through the passion and dedication of over 6,500 volunteer tutors. All of those learners and all of those tutors are neighbors in Washtenaw County.

Today, it is widely acknowledged that illiteracy is a common denominator for our community’s thorniest issues – homelessness, unemployment, poor health outcomes, family instability, recidivism, intergenerational illiteracy and lack of success in school.

In the next forty years, the challenge of eliminating illiteracy takes on new importance as the economy of Michigan shifts, and our learners have to move faster to find a place in this changing world. As has been the tradition, the Board of Washtenaw Literacy has responded with a bold challenge for a new time: to increase significantly the number of learners served. We can set this goal with confidence because we know from our history that the citizens of Washtenaw County are committed to improving literacy among our neighbors and therefore will continue to shape Washtenaw Literacy’s future.

Amy Goodman
Welcome to our annual report, celebrating our fortieth anniversary. On behalf of the Board, I would like to cast a very wide net in acknowledging those who have built Washtenaw Literacy, and those who are carrying the agency forward.

There are so many to thank for Washtenaw Literacy’s strong beginnings and growth. It is remarkable that our earliest partners, the Ypsilanti District Library and the Ann Arbor District Library, continue to this day as primary partners. Also, our collaboration with Washtenaw Community College helps extend the College’s reach as well as Washtenaw Literacy’s. Our fifth Executive Director, Amy Goodman, continues the tradition of innovative leadership that was established by her four predecessors. We thank the generations of committed Board Members for their service. Finally, our generous community has always demonstrated strong support for literacy through consistent giving.

Most of all, I want to acknowledge the over 6,500 volunteer tutors who, over the last forty years, have stepped up to help another adult learn to read, write or communicate in English. These tutors’ contributions continue to resonate through one adult’s improved literacy for generations to come. I am certain each tutor could tell inspiring stories of their amazing learners.

I learned of a story about a man in his 60s, who walked by a group several times before finding the courage to finally make an inquiry. With his hat pulled down over his eyes, he said “I think I want to learn how to read.” He didn’t know the sounds of the letters of the alphabet, but he progressed and now inspires others within the group. He has now announced “I think I’ve outgrown your group!” Whether our learners go on to a better job, a better home, more effective parenting, or confident health management, our tutors and learners know the work of improving literacy improves our community.

Going forward, Washtenaw Literacy will continue filling the critical needs. And, as has been our tradition, we will pursue innovative and effective ways to deliver services where they are needed the most in Washtenaw County.

Colleg Now is an intensive tutoring program at Washtenaw Community College that helps adults who do not have sufficient basic skills to enter a traditional GED program. Tutoring is customized for the specific goal of achieving a GED. Participants’ skills are assessed at the outset, and after every 20 hours of instruction. Before tutoring, the average reading level was 4th grade. After 20 hours of one-to-one tutoring, the average gain was 2.25 grade levels. After another 20 hours of one-to-one tutoring, the average gain was another 2.65 grade levels for a final average reading level of grade 8.9. According to Bonnie Truhn, Adult Transitions Coordinator at WCC, “Participants in the College Now tutoring program who are persistent and committed to the process will make significant gains in their reading levels in relatively short periods of time with the individualized instruction of the highly trained tutors. The experience also provides a way for students to identify the tools and strategies that will help them become more proficient and skilled learners as they transition to the next phase of their education.”

Washtenaw County Adult Education Collaborative.

Following a successful State of Michigan No Worker Left Behind demonstration grant, Washtenaw Literacy formed important program partnerships with Washtenaw Community College, Ann Arbor Public Schools Adult Education, Ypsilanti Public Schools Adult Education, Willow Run Public Schools Adult Education, Milan Public Schools Adult Education, and Chelsea Public Schools Adult Education. The Washtenaw County Adult Education Collaborative, a county-wide adult learning infrastructure, allows seamless service to adult learners as they transition from basic skills to post-secondary training and/or employment. The partnership results in more effective, economical and responsive program design and delivery. The one-to-one tutoring relationship Washtenaw Literacy brings to the partnership is the key to an effective literacy intervention with good outcomes. The one-to-one volunteer tutor model is the only way an intervention of this intensity can be implemented to scale, in any economic environment. Based on a review of six dropout prevention and college attendance programs for students at risk, incorporating personal bonds between students and teachers as a form of academic assistance helps adults perform well and overcome barriers to learning that were encountered in frontal classroom settings (Fashola & Slavin, 1998).

• Through Eastern Michigan University’s Institute for the Study of Children, Families and Communities, Washtenaw Literacy was awarded capacity-building funding and support as an agency with a mission and work that contributes to the economic recovery of Michigan.

• Highly qualified volunteers, Washtenaw Literacy’s Mentor team, enhance training, support and communication with hundreds of tutors. Through support from the Ann Arbor Area Community Foundation, the specialized Mentor team the proper level of support needed for success and retention in a volunteer-based tutoring program.

• Women who are isolated by language barriers learned to support their adopted community through volunteer work with area nonprofit agencies through support from the James A. and Faith Knight Foundation.

• As a literacy leader in Michigan, Washtenaw Literacy has been able to support the establishment and development of literacy initiatives in Westland Community Library, Livingston United Way, Plymouth Literacy, Novi Library and Milan Federal Correctional Facility. As a result, the tutor training capacity, infrastructure and tutor-learner support programs in these communities is stronger.

• Teen mothers improved their literacy by learning effective reading techniques when reading aloud to their babies through support from the Ann Arbor Kiwanis Club.

• Low-income, low-literate adults attained, maintained, or improved employment as a result of participation in our one-to-one tutoring program through support from Washtenaw County.

• Through support from the Washtenaw County Community Action Board, Washtenaw Literacy has taken leadership in supporting the Literacy Coalition of Washtenaw County.

Highlights of 2010-2011

- Washtenaw Literacy establishes a satellite office at Washtenaw Community College.

- Tutor Learner Resource Center opens at NEW Center. Washtenaw Literacy moves to its current location in the brand new Whittaker Road branch of the Ypsilanti District Library.
Literacy is the common denominator for addressing many of the challenges our society faces, resulting in higher levels of educational achievement, family-sustaining employment, stable housing, improved health management, and stronger communities.

Adult education is under fire. Eight years ago, State and Federal funding for Michigan was $80 million, last year it dropped to $18 million and next year the number will be even less. In Michigan, funding per adult learner is less than $20 per year and falling (Michigan DELEG, 2010).

The “Each One – Teach One” model of traditional literacy councils is a proven way to bridge the gap between the need – which is increasing, and the resources – which are decreasing. Literacy councils are assuming a fundamental role in challenging the alarming crisis of low-skilled adults in our communities throughout America (ProLiteracy America, 2009). As state and federal funding decrease, funding supplied at the local level will become even more critical.

Washtenaw Literacy founders and early supporters boldly confronted illiteracy. Forty years later Washtenaw Literacy leadership continues that challenge with one single goal: to serve 2,800 learners per year by the end of fiscal year 2015.
